

image not found or type unknown

Nowadays, many people believe that popular personalities are an example for imitation. I don't think so, because some stars behave horribly in public and greatly inflate self-esteem and such people should not be imitated.

Of course, the stars can be an example to follow in the performance of songs and artistry, and in how to perform the songs. But not more. For example, consider Lazarev. I don't think that such a person can be an example to follow. In public, he allows himself a lot. He considers himself an ideal and always tries to show it. On one of the projects, a girl performed and sang the song very well, but since Lazarev considers himself to be the best, he said not pleasant things about her singing. "Here you need to show your talent for singing, not amateur singing," Lazarev said, thereby showing that the girl is no one but he is a world star. After that, how can he be an example to follow, of course not.

Of course, there are stars to be equal to, and there are a lot of them. For example, Pelageya, she not only sings great, but also does not increase her self-esteem in public. And on the voice project, she always treated the participants appropriately and did not allow herself to belittle them and say that they did not sing well or perform well. She behaves like a real star. For me, this is the only example to follow. I also believe that the increased self-esteem of popular people is due to fame, money and problems in their personal life.

In conclusion, I want to say that popular people cannot be a role model due to high self-esteem and indecent behavior in public, as well as because of a thirst for money. And in our time, unfortunately, there are a lot of such artists.