Our world is unique like our life so. Often we meet with a choice and to tell a lie or not are our choice every day. I agree with the statement that it's wrong to tell a lie.

Sometimes I heard that to tell a lie for goodness is normal and good but I disagree with this fundamentally. I'm sure a lie can bring only evil because I believe in God's laws. I saw how lie broke people's life many times. If we look on different heroes of fiction, we will be able to see a lot of examples. For example, take the work of Leo Tolstoy "Anna Karenina". Anna Karenina is the main heroine of the novel. She is married, but one day she meets another man. This is Alexei Vronsky. He falls in love with her without memory, and Anna, who does not experience true love in her marriage, reciprocates him, feeling necessary and desirable. Anna is rushing between two fires. She tries to return to her husband, but the lie has already settled in her life. I see that in this work the lie embraces not only the fact of infidelity, but the whole of Anna's life. Love is only a nominal factor in her family, she feels dishonesty on the part of her husband, and all her attempts are doomed to failure. As a result, we see that Anna can't continue to live like this, her life is broken, she can't be with her loved one, and can't pretend to be a loving wife in the family. She takes a desperate step and throws herself under the train. Perhaps this is too crude an example, but it reflects well the fact that a lie does not bring anything good in our lives.

I'm sure that to tell a truth it is the best way in relationships.
