There are a lot of different countries in the world. And each country is unique in its own way. It's the same with families. Every family in the world is different. They may be similar, but they are still different. They have different traditions and characteristics, and it would be interesting to learn more about them. For example, in Russia, an ordinary family consists of parents and two children. They live separately with their grandparents. But they come for the holidays to be together. But in America, everything is not quite so, there in most cases either 1 child, or no children at all. And families are not as close to grandmothers as in Russia. Yes, they also meet and celebrate some holidays, but not as often as we do. Another example is the Japanese family. In Japan, families usually expand, so there they are very friendly and close. It is in Japan that family is the most important thing for a person, and it will always be in the first place. To sum up, we can say that all families are amazing in their own way. Some of them are very close to the family, some are not, but they still keep in touch. And this is the most important thing.
