Nowadays a lot of universities have students who graduate to be bankers but only a few of them become professionals in this area. Usually it is not enough to graduate from the university you also need to go through graduate school, doctoral program or internship. You can start your career as an accountant, a manager or a records clerk and then go up. Of course, it will take a lot of time and you will have to get experience and recommendations. But there is always a chance so there is something to look forward to and strive for. Bankers do very important work. It requires a lot of concentration and remarkable intellectual abilities. Besides, banker should be able to communicate with people because customer service is also his responsibility. In order to become a banking employee, you need to systematically update your knowledge, because the banking business does not stand still and you need to keep pace with the changes in banking legislation. But success depends not only on knowledge, but the atmosphere within the team is also an integral part. Coordinated work and understanding of the importance of processes are one of the main points of success in any business.

In my opinion, not just knowledge, but an understanding of the process distinguishes an ordinary employee from a professional who is able to see not only the problem in the future, but also the ways to solve it.
