I was born and raised on smaller town called Taraz. In the city my family and I have lived so long until I was about five years old. At that time I had two friends Tanya and Anya and childhood I spent having fun with them while my parents worked. And we lived in a small apartment of my mother's older sister.

Then we had to move to a suburban village. There lived my grandmother and other relatives. There I went to school and there had spent most of my life. It was nice and quiet village. On its outskirts proceeded Talas river. We often went swimming in the summer. I had a lot of girlfriends, sisters and brothers around, so that was fun. And in the fifth grade, I was transferred to another school in the neighboring village, where I studied already to the graduating class. After the final exam, I began to collect documents for university entrance. I decided to enroll in the university city of Almaty. This is one of the largest cities of Kazakhstan. Compared to Taraz, where the population is only about 350 thousand people, more than a million people live in Almaty. Almaty is the complete opposite of my hometown. With his hectic lifestyle, color and perspective. It is a city of students, people full of hope, the city of ups and downs. Contrasting architecture and the mountains that surround the town, attract the eye. Weather here, too unpredictable. And summer and winter can give rainy. This city never sleeps. If coming at early morning in Taraz you can see only town covered by pre-dawn mist and with empty streets, then in Almaty always moving. Even in the night. I was raptured by changing of scenery. Despite the fact that I have not seen all the sights. I was not in the mountains, not riding on the famous cable car. But exactly that is what keeps me here.

In Almaty, many parks, shopping malls, cinemas, and the streets are fine for walking. I started a lot of new friends here, studying and working in various fields. All of this is difficult to achieve in my hometown. Now I live with distant relatives in the city center, I work in the mall pathos and all is well.
