Kazakhstan is one of the most multinational countries. That is why three languages are obligatory for learning here - Kazakh, Russian and English.

Kazakh is the state language. It is studied in all schools from the elementary class. Knowledge of the national language gives a great advantage. Sometimes competitions in knowledge of the Kazakh language are held in the country with various prizes to the winners. This motivates to study the national language and a better understanding of the country's culture.

Russian is also important; it is also taught in all educational institutions. The majority of the population in the country are Kazakhs, but there are many Russians, Ukrainians, and other nationalities, and the Russian language simplifies communication between them.

English is important as the language of international communication. Since tourism, trade and other areas are flourishing in the country, we often meet representatives of different countries and visit other countries ourselves. Learning all the languages of the world in order to understand each other is not an easy, almost impossible task. English is a universal assistant in this case, it will allow you to find a common language with people abroad and with tourists.

Many representatives of the state nation prefer to communicate only in their native language, perhaps they are driven by laziness and ignorance, because of which they do not learn Russian and English and, in principle, speak Kazakh with everyone, not worrying about whether they understand them, moreover, Considering that they are all obliged to understand. I consider this a backward position.

This is the language situation in my country today. Perhaps in the future, something will change for the better.
