It is simply vital for each person to have aims and to live trying to fulfill them. At first, they might seem impossible, but if we genuinely want something, it usually comes true.

Aims can be different. Some people connect them with professional growth and career, others want to have a large family with many children in it. There are some that want to become famous or to stand out from the crowd. All these aims are worth considering.

As a child, I dreamt of having a bicycle and my parents bought it for me for good behavior and excellent marks at school. Our goals change and mature as we become older. However, we should remember if we really want something to become true, we should make every effort to achieve it. Nothing comes easy.

At the moment, one of my main goals is to learn foreign languages and I know if I don't study hard it will remain a simple unfulfilled dream. That's why I take every chance to learn new words and expressions and to practice them in writing and speaking. After university, I would like to connect my life with translation activities. That's my next goal and I know I will have to strive for it as it's not easy.

Another goal that I have is to have my own car and to learn how to drive. At first, I will need to learn the theory and the Highway Code. Then I will be allowed to practice driving in the streets of our city.

In the future, I would also like to have a united family: a loving husband and a couple of children. These are not my only life aims, but perhaps the most important ones. I'm happy to be having them because nothing is really important without having aims in life.

Taking into consideration the mentioned above, I can draw the conclusion that in today's world, almost everything is feasible. We just have to choose the right way to make our dreams come true.
