I've lived in both the city and the countryside. Therefore, I can definitely say that I like life in the city rather than in the countryside.

The advantages of living in the city are that the city has its own special atmosphere of civilized life. To live in a city is to be constantly in some kind of asset. Play sports, go to restaurants, go to exhibitions, go to business meetings, before work, go to a fragrant bakery for fresh coffee.

Of course, due to the large number of cars, factories and various enterprises, the air in the city is not as clean as in the countryside. Living in the city is sometimes even difficult, because from constant activity, a person also gets tired and wants to go somewhere to relax.

Life in the countryside also has its advantages. There is fresh air, a beautiful natural landscape that pleases the eye. If you do not like to constantly be in a new environment, meet new people, then life in the countryside is for you. I think that the people who live there rarely have something new happening. If only for children who play and come up with new entertainment for themselves. And adults just work and they can't even go somewhere new, because everyone in the circle already knows.

Bottom line: people who love diversity and activity live in cities, and people who love a quiet life in their home live in rural areas.
