What is the person ready to go to achieve his cherished goal? It happens that people in pursuit of a dream do not pay attention to the ways in which they reach it. Very often, the interests of others are pushed to the background, and sometimes they are manipulated in order to fulfill this or that intention. Most people act this way and act inhumanely. Still Machiavelli said: "The end justifies the means." But what if this goal comes into confrontation with morality, law or religious dogma?

Any goal that is achieved at the expense of someone's suffering, often in the end turns out to be unwanted. Many people are ready to follow their dream of sacrificing ethical norms and rules of morality, but not all are able to bear the consequences that it entailed. Does the purpose justify the means? No, if this means is a person.

Therefore, if my goal is achieved by the victims of people, or my way to this goal will harm people, then I am ready to give up this goal
