The French pilot, writer, poet and essayist Antoine de Saint-Exupery once said: "Upbringing takes precedence over education. Upbringing creates a person. " This expression resonates with my acceptance of the correct upbringing of a child in a family. The upbringing of a child begins from an early age, and it is the parents who give the right upbringing in the family in the first place. In my opinion, these are parents who are kind, affectionate and loving, firstly, each other, and secondly, their child. My parents always understood me well, gave me freedom of choice, but at the same time they made sure that I did not get into any bad story, and were aware of almost all the events and facts that happened in my life. I believe that parents should love and accept their child as he is - of course, regardless of his success and characteristics. Unconditional acceptance is the foundation of a relationship with a child. It is very important that these relationships in the family are real, as the child feels any falsehood. Only parents are capable of loving a child, regardless of whether he is thin or fat, intellectually gifted or slow-witted, hyperactive or unhurried. Parents should help their child understand the world, delineate the boundaries of his behavior. The main task of parents in a family is to explain "what is good and what is bad." Parents are the very people who are the first to start showing the child the norms and boundaries of what is permitted and forbidden, acceptable and unacceptable. Marking boundaries helps a child understand the world, navigate and live in it. When the child does not know the rules and regulations, this most often leads to behavioral disorders, difficulties in accepting any framework, rules and standards. I have good parents who raised me and helped me become the person I am now. They taught me - kindness, understanding, patience, compassion, diligence, responsiveness, attentiveness, honesty, respect for elders, self-confidence.
