Hamlet, in my opinion, a very strong person. After learning from the Ghost about his father's murder his own brother, he decides to avenge the premature death of her beloved father. But yet hamlet hesitates, he has to hide behind a mask of madness, he tries to answer all the questions that he himself asks. Hamlet does not want to come to terms with the surrounding evil, but at the same time he is trying to get absolute proof of the guilt of his uncle. So he kills the king.

Hamlet is trying to find support from Ophelia, he tests her love. After his mother almost from the funeral went to the altar, he doubts even in love Ophelia. But hamlet loves Ophelia, and that's what he goes to for support after a meeting with a Ghost. But he unwittingly turns out to be the cause of her death. Ophelia, clean, naive, can't stand the fact that her lover killed her father. She goes crazy and then dies.

But after the death of Ophelia hamlet is deprived of one of the most dear to him. This death heralds the end of the hamlet. Hamlet is not afraid of death, he asks Horatio to tell about this tragedy.

I think that without people like hamlet cannot be committed to the progress of society, because without such a soft but strong people, like hamlet, society will not budge. If the land will be resolute realists and will not humanists, boundlessly trusting in the goodness of people on earth will not be good. Goodness is not the basis, norm and gradually disappear altogether.
